"CHRISTIANS ONLY"

Rabbi Maurice N. Eisendrath

From a report of a recent sermon delivered by one of our colleagues, Dr. Abraham Simon, it would appear that anti-semitism can be quite easily solved by the Jew alone and that much of the onus of this bitter prejudice rests on our own shoulders. "For," he writes, self-criticism practiced by the Jew is necessary. It is his duty to see to it that nothing in his personal or social life and nothing in his attitude toward his fellowmen or country may tend to lessen the appreciation of his neighbor toward him. He should see that the purity of his motive, the probity of his character, the sweetness of his domestic life, form the shield against which every arrow will fall blunted. It is his duty to see that nothing in his social behavior encourages prejudice or widens the breach between him and his Christian neighbor. And this type of preaching is not new to him. Nor ought the Jews forget that they have their own little prejudices among themselves and, what is more to the point, that there are Jewish employers of labor who discriminate against people of their own faith to evidence their liberality of thought and their pro-Nordic preferences."

With all of which we quite agree as good teaching for us Jews to follow, but as a remedy for anti-semitism it is absurd. Here Dr. Simon but echoes the emasculated recommendations made by Heywood Broun in the closing chapters of "Christians Only" that good will between Christian and Jew is largely dependent upon certain changes incumbent upon the Jew. Heywood Broun, for example, maintains with the best of intentions, to be sure, but with limited insight, that the Jew should assimilate more swiftly to the environment of which he is a part; that he should relinquish many of his grotesque and incongruous Orientalisms — and bitter feeling will miraculously follow. Well, we are inclined to believe likewise that certain ancient forms and practices can be relinquished without harming the essence of Judaism, that certain old garments can be shorn without injuring the heart of our faith — for we are convinced that the Jew has survived all the mutations of time solely because he has been able thus to change and develop and grow, but we can never agree that such things should be done for the reasons that Broun suggests in order to please the intolerant majority who can countenance only those who slavishly and swivellingly mimic themselves. Heywood Broun has given us in "Christians Only" a magnificent and searching analysis of the problem of anti-semitism on this continent, but his suggested remedies are in part at least extremely superficial and weak. Anti-semitism might conceivably be lessened if the Jew dressed and ate and acted and thought exactly like the non Jew, but at what a price in the sacrifice of human self determination and the right to differ. That would not be attaining the goal of good-will. It does not take a saint to like those who flatter his vanity by seeking to become exactly like himself. To like the unlike, that's the secret of understanding and until that be gained good-will is a mockery and a sham.

Thus has Dr. Simon similarly erred. All that he says is true, as an analysis, but as a corrective it is shallow indeed. True enough, we would do well to eradicate every last vestige of "anti-semitism" which exists among Jews, to rout every petty discrimination which so unhappily maintains between Jew and fellow Jew, and to present to the world a gloriously united front. Yes, and we agree too that we Jews can do something to allay this fearful scourge of anti-semitism by likewise honoring the honest Christian and respecting reverently his belief, still, in the final analysis, the solution of the problem rests not with the persecuted, but with the persecutors. We quite agree also that the Jew should be less seclusive, and clannish; but how can he be otherwise when doors are everywhere shut in his face?

Good-will on the part of the Jew, (and I do believe there are many of our brethren who might more sedulously cultivate this spirit so native to our faith,) still, good will on the part of the Jew cannot but prove abortive unless our attitude is fully and heartily reciprocated. As there can be no solo-marriages, so there must be two equally congenial parties to this business of good-will. Throughout the United States and Canada, Good-Will Dinners have been held by the hundreds. With few exceptions they have been initiated by Jews, and have been held in Synagogues. Rarely have such visits been paid back by invitations issued to the Synagogue to break bread within those houses of worship dedicated to the Jew of Galilee. Oh yes, Rabbis frequently occupy such pulpits, and I presume that that is a significant step forward; yet let not these churches, that have gone even that far, pride themselves on their true Christian fellowship, nor boast as sometimes they do a bit too patronizingly that they have at last broken down the barriers between Christian and Jew. Until not merely a single individual, the Rabbi, for example, or the "oh, so different kind of Jew," but until the whole house of Israel is welcomed beneath the roof of Christian churches and clubs and hospitals and schools and offices and homes, we will not even have approximated the Brotherhood of which we prattle so much.

every friday

"Sometimes when people censure me,
I tell them without rancor,
That for what it cost me to be free,
I might have had an anchor."

The last issue of the Review carried the announcement that there is to be a new Yiddish weekly for Canada. It will be called the Canadian Tribune and it will be published in good old Toronto. Two hands accomplished in the lively and stimulating pastime of running a Yiddish newspaper, who will be editor and manager, respectively, are none other than A. Rhinewine and H. M. Kirshenbaum, late of the Toronto Hebrew Journal where they occupied similar positions for years.

This column eyes the Messrs. Kirshenbaum and Rhinewine with child-like wonder and more than a trace of profound envy. Occasional translations from the masterpieces of these gentlemen when they held forth in the Hebrew Journal have left this column with the dejected feeling that it is better to take up dairying in Saskatoon than to drag out an existence unable to address the world from columns done in Yiddish. What does English amount to compared with the verbal color of the Yiddish of Messrs. Kirshenbaum and Rhinewine? Beside their slashing denunciations, their sonorous swear words, their luscious allusions to someone's defective and even criminal ancestry, their incomparable, contemptuous diminutives, English stays so pallid as to be almost useless as a means of retort discourteous. The life of a newspaper person, editor, publisher or manager is a thankless one; it is a dog's life at best. But nevertheless there are compensations when the weapons of attack and defence consist of all the grandiose variety of expressions possible only to conventional Yiddish newspaper usage.

Without knowing or caring what the politics, the policies, and the scope of the proposed publication will be, this column hastens to congratulate the Canadian Tribune not merely in accordance with the emotionless rules of newspaper etiquette but with hearty good wishes and even a friendly concern. For, if it is not strictly true and obvious that just what the country needs at this time is a new paper, at least it must be obvious that what the new paper will need is the country.

This column hopes that the Canadian Tribune will not be what a Jew in Soho called "a bad success." Just as there ought to be a new and elegant synagogue for every ten disgruntled members of any congregation, by right there should be a new and flourishing newspaper every time a manager and an editor sever their connection with a publication and go off together in search of office space. It would be grand to see at least one newspaper of Jewish opinion for, say, every ten Jews in the Dominion. It would mean that business is better than good and that a fancy era of prosperity was upon the country at last, takke.

But meantime even the eye of an eagle could discern little upon which to build the hope that the Jews of Canada should indulge themselves in so many newspapers that in a short time they may become unable to remember the names of all of them. They ought to bear up and get along with the existing newspapers, such as they are, until better days. Otherwise they may be open to the suspicion that they have taken a terrible shine to reading, all of a sudden. Also, if there are any who feel forced to admit that, whereas any one can start a newspaper in boom times, it takes courage to start one now, this column would diffidently take issue with these by suggesting that the current Lindberghs are foolhardy rather than brave.

Something should be done forthwith about the case of the proposed Canadian Tribune, the Messrs. Kirshenbaum and Rhinewine and the bereaved Toronto Hebrew Journal. After all, there is no reason why mah jongg as an indoor sport should be supplanted by the establishing of new papers just because times are hard and certain connections have been severed. For sixteen years Mr. Rhinewine worked for the Hebrew Journal. Mr. Kirshenbaum is also part and parcel of the paper. Both of them miss it as surely as some days are rainy and some days fair. These gentlemen and the Hebrew Journal have weathered many a communal blast together. The Hebrew Journal must miss them. What is indicated here is the presence of a person or persons with common sense and tact to arrange for the postponement of the Canadian Tribune for the present while Messrs. Kirshenbaum and Rhinewine return to the Hebrew Journal where they belong at least for a while. f.f.c.

The Enemy's Gates

"Suppose I don't come to you?" George, in his turbid wrath, had the reckless impulse to plunge deeper into danger. He stood in front of her now, his face close to hers. "Suppose I shut up this house next week and took you back to New York with me?"

Distractedly, Ann shook her head. "Oh, for heaven's sake, George," she cried, "let's drop it. Let's be reasonable. I don't care a rap about the old sleeping porch. It doesn't matter to me where we live next year."

"Oh, it doesn't." His eyes gleamed. "Very well — that's all right then."

He had got the better of her. He had forced from her the confession that she was in his hands. "Just be careful — just keep in mind that I'd like to be consulted myself once in a while." Turning his back on her, he marched across the beach and into the water with the swinging stride of the conscious victor.

Ann, as she watched him, realised to the full her danger; she had let him strike her down to-day. In this instant of her humiliation, she felt the stir of her indomitable spirit. She must fight in future not for a brief equivocal peace, but for her very salvation.

She had been robbed of every quickening hope that summer. In the past, during the days of her heaviest discouragement, she had comforted herself with the thought that her marriage had still to be put to the ultimate test. It would have struck her as sheer hysterical folly to generalize from the lamentable record of their first year and a half together. The selfish ecstasies of their bodies, the jarring impact of their minds against each other must naturally make of the relation a constant warfare. Genuine union must wait upon the time when, out of this fierce sowing of the dragon's teeth, would come a tender human growth. But now she had had her child. There was nothing further to be looked to in the future. They had fulfilled their common lot, she and George. They

United Palestine Appeal

Jacob de Haas, of New York was the guest speaker at a luncheon in the Mount Royal Hotel Tuesday, April 28, for control and divisional chairmen and captains working in the United Palestine Appeal to raise $100,000 in Montreal by Thursday. He was accompanied by Mrs. de Haas. Jacob de Haas has been associated with the movement on this continent since 1902 when he went to the United States at the request of Theodore Herzl whom Mr. de Haas served as honorary secretary. Mr. de Haas was at one time secretary of the Zionist organization in the United States, and was English secretary of the first Zionist congress.

In a radio address over station CFCF Thursday night, April 23, Louis Fitch, K.C., said:

"The establishment of the Jewish National Home in Palestine, means the preservation of the Jewish people, and the earnest defence against the extinction which menaces them. That the Jewish people should not become extinct is imperative for the Gentiles as well as for the Jew. Each people brings to humanity, as each child brings to a family, a unique character, a special genius which enriches the human spirit and its achievement upon the earth.

"Our people have in the past given a wealth of contribution to civilization. There is no reason to believe that the wells have dried up, but that, on the contrary, with our emancipation they will produce even broader values to the totality of what goes to make up human culture."

Members of Hadassah, with ten per cent of their cards canvassed, had raised approximately 16 per cent of their quota under the direction of Mrs. A. Selick, chairman of the women's campaign committee.

Zionists must stand firm in their insistence on the restoration of Palestine, and though they face the reactionary forces of the British Empire, and the British Government, which does not understand the Jews, they must continue their efforts doggedly and consistently for the realization of their dreams.

These thoughts summarized the views of Jacob de Haas, leading Jewish writer and lecturer, and prominent Zionist, of New York, expressed at the luncheon in the Mount Royal Hotel.

"I am not encouraged by the political evolution of our movement since last October," he said at the outset. "It is clear that the British Government, the controlling factor, is hopelessly divided between two forces, between MacDonald, on the one hand, who would like to come to terms with us, and Passfield, on the other hand, who is uncomprisingly opposed to us. The MacDonald paper was never seen by MacDonald and he put his signature to it, so that that paper, as an interpretation to the Passfield White Paper, is not such a hopeful document as some of our friends, who want encouragement, would believe.

"Today there is a conference meeting in England which we, in New York, if we could, would 'shunt.' That conference is meeting to consider the Palestine Land Development Scheme of the British Government. We are bending our efforts to 'push' it off, but if we cannot succeed we will try to make it as harmless as possible.

"There is some encouragement to be found in the fact that the Legislative Council is not going to come. We have had the courage to say that we don't want it," and Mr. de Haas used this attitude to support his argument that Zionists everywhere should come out publicly and forcefully with declarations of their views on important questions affecting the movement.

Today, he continued, Zionists are struggling for a reality as against a dream, 40 years ago, and they were capable of continuing that struggle because they were inspired by hope. They had struggled in the face of strong opposition, through strife and persecution, in the face of enmity against the Jewish race, enmity bolstered by prejudice and contempt, "whereas now there is a sort of envy."

In 1917 when the British Government gave them Palestine a certain section thought they were handing over a country which was practically worthless but the development work between 1920 and 1930 has revealed its potentialities and its mineral resources. Then the wire pullers were upset because they realized the loss of profits, but Mr. de Haas made it clear that when he criticized this class he was not directing his shafts at the British people in general.

The trouble over the whole situation was that, in Palestine, the British Government was dealing with a problem they do not understand "because they do not understand the Jews." They could not understand why the Jews should not be satisfied with what had been done already, but the reason was that the Jews insisted on freedom, life and authority.

The struggle must continue, he said, because it meant hope for their own race. "We have fought in the past for righteousness and justice and we have to convince the world that we should have the right to live, and that no forces on God's earth will take our rights away from us."

In conclusion Mr. de Haas reminded his hearers that when they appealed for money they were asking for the ammunition for the forces in the front line, the Jews now in Palestine. There were many Jews anxious to go back there, he added, Jews in the capitalist class of whom there was almost a daily procession to the Zionist offices in New York seeking information about ways and means of returning to that land. As an instance, he said that between February 15 and April 1, this year, the capital represented by people for whom they obtained passports amounted to $1,500,000.

Mrs. de Haas spoke briefly.

CLASH FEATURES ZIONIST REGIONAL CONFERENCE

At a conference with delegates from Zionist organizations in Ontario, held at Hamilton, April 26, plans were consummated for the creation of a Zionist region in the province. Speakers were A. J. Freiman, Dominion President of the Zionist Organization, and James Waterman Wise of New York.

Trouble arose over a resolution expressing confidence in the work of Dr. Chaim Weizmann, world leader of the Zionist movement. Mr. Freiman protested that such a resolution should go to the Dominion Zionist body and that the Ontario conference had no jurisdiction over the matter. Delegates in all parts of the hall took up the issue and an argument ensued on economic policies and Dr. Weizmann's leadership.

Mr. Welsgal opposed the opinion of the Zionist president and when the latter endeavored to speak, Mr. Welsgal exerted his rights as chairman and ruled him out of order.

With the chairman banging with his gavel to restore order and the delegates adding to the confusion by jumping to their feet and all talking at once, Mr. Freiman and Mr. Welsgal argued for a few moments and then the former turned on his heel, strode from the platform and disappeared out the door, despite the efforts of executive officers to restrain him.

A little later Mr. Welsgal walked to the front of the platform and stated that he wished to speak on a matter of personal privilege.

"I sincerely regret the discussion that took place a few minutes ago and if in the course of my conduct of the chair, I said anything that offended Mr. Freiman or any one else, I humbly apologize," said Mr. Welsgal. "There is nothing so vital to Zionism as a free expression of opinion. I differ with Mr. Freiman and he differs from me but we are all Zionists. We all appreciate what Dr. Weizmann has done and regardless of political Zionism I say no man can represent us with as much force and vitality as Dr. Weizmann.

"I hope Mr. Freiman appreciates that when Zionists meet they may express their respective opinions and I beg of him that he come back and take his rightful place with us." Several executive members hurriedly went in search of Mr. Freiman and he and the chairman later shook hands.

A. B. Bennett outlined the Zionist movement. He stated that confusion of the elementary principles of Zionism had been due to the doubt and confusion in the minds of the Jews. Unless Zionism could square itself with the ruling idealism and ideas of life, it was doomed to extinction. He impressed upon his audience the necessity of harmonizing with these other principles. The basic conception of Zionism, he declared, was that the Jews were not merely a religious group, but a nation and if the Jews were to exist as a nation they must again have possession of Palestine. "Zionism has so far justified itself," said Mr. Bennett. "It revived the hearts of the Jews, replacing a spirit of despondency with a virile energy to work for the ends we hold nearest our heart."

Meyer W. Weisgal, of Toronto, was elected president of the new Zionist region. Honorary vice-presidents elected were Mayor David Croll, of Windsor; Dr. I. Goldstick, of London; Max Epstein, of Hamilton, and Mrs. David Dunkelman of Toronto. Sam Kronick, of Toronto, was elected honorary president; David Dunkelman, of Toronto, treasurer, and B. Vise, of the same city, secretary.

must make what they could of their present garnered store. If they went on having babies, they would merely be repeating a familiar task, like children who mechanically recite over and over again a lesson that they have learned by heart. They had come to the end of their earthly experience. After her confinement, George's new calm, that steadied him through the whole first year of his son's life, had made her happier than she had ever been before. His contentment had been that of a dumb animal in the presence of his female and his cub. He had had his sporadic fits of grumpiness, of course; but those few deep rumbles of his well-known growl had seemed less a menace than a half reluctant purring. Never quite sure of him, she had yet rested for the most part in a soothed quiescence. Then, in a dizzied terror, she had seen him return from his first week in New York a miserable antagonist, with a sightless floundering in his movements and a stupefied pain around his mouth. He was still trying to fight off his trouble. He had run into the Rhode Island cottage, kissed her with a sheepish tenderness and tried to smile calmly at her. He had been apologetic, excited, incoherent; he was running away from the dark rancors that had crowded back upon him in town. Ann had understood in a flash that he had come back to her a man possessed; but she had been able to quiet him that time, practically to convince him that he was still the fortunate dweller in a snug animal den.

By his second visit, however, she had begun to experience the stunned sensation of helplessness. He had followed her gloomily from room to room of the cottage, like a hunted creature dragging about with him the heavy log of a trap from which he has escaped only by tugging it up from the ground and pulling it after him. All day long, Ann heard his dogged footsteps back of her. He gave her not a moment's respite. He found fault with her capable handling of little Nic. "That kid ought to be walking by now; you don't let him try his legs enough," he argued. "It's a shame, shutting him up in his room and letting him cry like that," he would complain. "He's hungry — I have no sympathy with this business of going by rule. He should be fed whenever his stomach demands it." He insisted, while the child was being bathed, that he was in a bad draft. "He'll catch his death of cold, see if he doesn't."

"George — why don't you go and work in your garden?" Ann would urge wearily. "And pick us some string-beans for lunch, that's a good boy."

"It's too hot, out there in the broiling sun." He refused to be banished to the garden. He was neglecting it, letting the lazy farmer tend to it. When he did go over there, it was only to shoot the marauding crows and starlings with his revolver. The rôle of hunter suited his mood better now than that of the patient husbandman. "I come down here for rest, not to pick vegetables."

He had soon made it obvious to Ann that the future was to be simply a reenactment of the past. He had dragged her back to the old daily round of unprofitable argument and baseless antagonism; and there was no remote prospect of an escape together now. Their opportunity had come and gone. Ann was too fagged to front the dreary years ahead with conscious courage; unknowingly, however, she was preparing herself for liberation. She was powerless to face the one terrible alternative to her present misery. Her love for George was beyond all cure; she could not believe it possible that she might one day have the strength to go on without him: and yet he was coercing her to an involuntary recoil from him. So tremendous was his suspicion that it had worked upon her and caused her to act the part it had chosen for her. She was no longer patient and sweet-tempered in her opposition to him. A harshness came into her voice at times; there were moments when her face looked old and lined and almost cruel in its starved intensity. She would not let him interfere with her management of the baby. To all of his suggestions she opposed a sharp short negative. She became relentlessly severe in her discipline. Having learnt the tragic havoc George could wreak, she had set herself the heart-breaking task of rooting out of the child's nature all traits of the man she loved. Sandy, unfortunately, was not the only one that saw the change in her. George, too, in his week-end visits, noticed her increasing sternness; and at last he was aroused to fury.

Among Toronto Jewish Women

Mrs. E. I. Kenen, 50 Bernard Avenue, says: "One of the most capable women of my acquaintance is Mrs. L. M. Schwartz, of 33 Monroe Park. For the past seven years she has been chairlady of that large active Central Chapter of Hadassah. Her infinite patience in dealing with women and affairs, her sweet disposition and friendly smile have won for her an enviable reputation in this city. She was the founder of the Beaches Ladies' Auxiliary and is known to her associates as a very thorough worker and a capable executive. When a particularly difficult programme must be carried out she is sought for the task, as she has never been known to fail in any project she undertook. Her enthusiasm and zeal as a public worker has attracted her daughter, Mrs. J. Rosenfeld, and it looks as though she will follow in her mother's footsteps. Mrs. Rosenfeld is president of the Ruth Chapter of Hadassah."

"CHRISTIANS ONLY"

Messrs. Heywood Broun and George Britt are the authors of a fact-finding volume bearing the above title. The book is a careful study in the problem of prejudice and in a way presents a damning indictment against the Christlessness of so called Christians in their actions and reactions toward the Jew.

We are not acquainted with the achievements and accomplishments of Mr. Britt. But certainly Mr. Broun, we know, is one person who, by virtue of training and experience, is fitted in every way to present the rising tide of Anti-Semitism in the United States. As the famous columnist of the New York World-Telegram, he has time and again lifted his pen in the cause of human advancement. A year ago Mr. Broun set out to help the jobless. He came in contact with hundreds of the unemployed. In co-operation with others, he found jobs for almost a thousand men and women. This "nerve wrecking" business of "placing people" revealed to him the sad plight of the sons and daughters of Israel who are job-hunting.

And so we have the book "Christians Only" in which are piled up the facts of "Rishus" in the Professions, in the Colleges and in the general fields of employment. And what a ghastly picture of discrimination and Jew-baiting in so called enlightened and civilized America it presents.

The authors in introducing the problem ably point out that: "discrimination against Jews in New York spreads all over the city, reaches like a dark cloud into the narrowest and most remote streets to the largest and smallest lines of employment. It is practiced deliberately and unconsciously by those who dislike Jews and by those who don't care but who yield to a supposed demand by the public. It is of vast proportions and by no means decreasing."

In the chapter on Professional Prejudice we read the following pointed utterances by a Rabbi — "The only profession I know that does not bar Jews is the rabbinical profession."

Dealing with the nasty business of job-hunting, Broun writes — "office work as a class is difficult for Jews to obtain. The largest and richest banks in New York have rules against employing Jews, except in unusual cases . . . The public utility companies as a class, largely in control of Gentiles, are considered the hardest fields for all Jews to enter."

Broun quotes at length from letters written by Jews who have been hit hard by discrimination. Here is a typical one written by a girl who heard Mr. Broun speak on the unemployment situation: "If you expect to give us another one of your talks in the near future, it wouldn't be a bad idea to emphasize the fact that Jews are also human and must eat. I can truthfully boast of just as much refinement and good breeding as some of my Christian colleagues and strange to relate, I get just as hungry as they do."

But what causes heart ache is to find in Broun's study, an intimation that some few Jews have also become Christianized and "join the hunt" of their fellow Jews. "A high official of a large department store which is wholly owned by Jewish capital said: "Yes, we have a quota on Jewish help for two reasons. Although we are Jewish owned we do not desire to be known as a "Jew Store" and fear to become such in reputation if we have too many Jewish sales people: secondly, we do not want our staff too much depleted on the religious holidays." There is the tragedy—Jews also practice Anti-Semitism! And here is a damning indictment against some of our smug rich Jews—"In so far as charity goes, the rich and influential Jew is good to his own. He will subscribe money to help the "down and outer" among his own people. But he is much less ready to extend the social hand of fellowship to those who have just emerged from below the surface of fierce economic struggle. Among the leaders in New York are many Jews who have taken over much of the familiar Gentile jargon in regard to the nascent graduate of the ghetto."

"The Way Out" constitutes the last chapter of the book. Here the authors attempt at solutions to the problem of ill-will between Jew and non-Jew and of course they flounder. To find a panacea for the dreadful disease of prejudice is no easy matter. Even the suggestion by the authors of making fun of prejudice and show how ridiculous it is—will help very little. The observation by the writers that "if hate is natural in human beings, fellowship is no less so" is also of no avail.

We believe that as long as there will be different convictions, so long there will be prejudice, for prejudice may "be the dark side of convictions."

What we can aim for is to reduce prejudice to a minimum. Therein lies the task for the religious leaders and intellectual thinkers of our day. No matter to what group we belong, we can teach our followers to appreciate the virtues and convictions of other groups and races. And last but not least we must search out our "unities" — the things we all have in common.

"Christians Only" presents a challenge to the Christian world. It speaks to the Jew-baiters even as Emil Zola's "I Accuse" spoke to the anti-semites of France and Europe of another day.

THE TEST OF JEWISH GENEROSITY

Times are bad. No one will deny. But there is no valid reason why the educational, religious and philanthropic institutions be the victims of these days of depression. We hear that in a number of communities Talmud Torah teachers and educational directors have not received their stipends in months! All this indicates that American Jewry has indeed become panic-stricken with fear because of Wall Street crashes. There is no doubt about it.

Yet if the truth be spoken, individual Jews have practiced little, if any, self-denial as far as their own standards of living are concerned. Jews who cut their dues to Temples and Synagogues and similar institutions have not given up residing in elaborate homes. These still have their butlers and chauffeurs. Their expensive automobiles are still kept "on the run." And what's more, they even haven't denied themselves the adventures of winter and summer vacations at the most expensive resorts. Yes and midnight parties are still in full swing. These things, of course, are necessities even though times be hard. Yet the times are hard — but the thinking is also soft. Therein lies the tragedy. Jews, many of them, have lost the spirit of self-sacrifice and the dignity of Jewish responsibility. Hence, let the communal institutions go begging and even crash!

Thus it is that Morris D. Waldman, secretary of the American Jewish Committee, rightly states: "These present business conditions constitute a challenge to the spirituality of the Jewish people. They are being subjected to a severe test. It is one thing to give generously for philanthropy out of bursting surpluses and phenomenally increased incomes. It is another to give while seeing visions of the poor house around the corner. Will the Jews of America be swept by a panic of fear to abandon their community obligations, and destroy their reputation for philanthropy? Or in the re-adjustment of their own standards of living will they still incorporate items for charity and education as necessary expenditures? Indeed we also agree with Mr. Waldman when he claims that there are a number of comfortably situated people crying "wolf" when there is no wolf. Many alas hide behind the present economic depression to avoid giving.
